

- How - To Help A Child Grieving A Beloved Pet

The loss of a beloved pet is a major life experience for children and it is often their first introduction to death. The closer the bond and the longer the pet's life, the bigger the impact and challenge. Pets are a special type of sibling or best friend, so it can be profoundly life-changing and difficult when they leave the family's circle. To help kids feel loved, included, and understood, plenty of affection, patience, and reassurance go a long way for everyone involved.

A Truly Formative Experience

Death presents a vital and deeply meaningful opportunity for children to learn that love and grief go hand-in-hand. How adults support and guide them along this path is truly formative and the lessons they learn about themselves, others, and the world will ripple through the rest of their lives. As with all parenting in a stressful, complex situation, youngsters will look to you as their role model to learn how to mourn, express themselves, and become resilient.

Every individual grieves differently and at their own pace, and while there are familiar patterns, the experience tends to feel like a roller coaster. Your child will be grateful to have you beside them on the ride. This experience will help to prepare them for new loves and losses, as they will inevitably occur.

With children of different ages, you may want to speak with them separately at first if this is possible. Older kids tend to appreciate that younger siblings can't process as much. This approach also allows you to honor the differences in their temperaments, relationships with the pet, and grieving styles.

It can take a long while for reality to register — depending on their developmental age, they may not recognize the significance of the loss or even seem troubled by it at first. Phases of understanding will continue as they mature and revisit the loss.

You are fortunate if you're able to anticipate the pet's passing because it gives you a chance to plan. Keep in mind that your child will be picking up on subtle shifts in how you and other family members, including furry ones, are relating to your pet so they may start asking questions sooner than you expect.

Questions Kids Tend to Ask

You may be wondering what to do if your child asks a question that you're uncertain about answering. It's natural to be tempted to make things up or whitewash the facts, hoping they'll be satisfied or relieved.

Instead, take a deep breath and begin by exploring what they already understand. Then share what you do know or believe, and acknowledge what you don't. It's perfectly fine to respond with something like, "Uhm-hm, I wonder," or "What do you think?" or "Yes, that's a good question. Can I think about it and we'll talk a little later?" If it's too difficult to answer, enlist another adult or professional for help.

Here are some of the questions you might anticipate:

- What is death? Is it forever?
- Why did s/he die?
- Was it my fault?
- Where did s/he go?
- When is s/he coming back? Or, Will we get to be with her/him again?
- Is s/he with God? Or, Is s/he in Heaven?
- Can I see her/him?
- Can s/he hear us?
- Are you going to die? Or, Am I going to die?

- Pointers - To Guide Supportive Adults

- Due to the sensitive nature of pet loss, it's best to explain things openly and truthfully and at the child's developmental level of understanding.
- Use the terms "death," "dying," and "euthanasia" instead of "going away," "passing," "lost", "put to sleep," or "put down" to avoid confusion and fear.
- If needed, state clearly that death means the body has completely stopped working and moving, that it won't start again, and that the pet can no longer feel anything or experience pain.
- If the pet is old or visibly sick and declining, point out the changes and diminished quality of life.
- Initiate brief exchanges at first to gauge their comfort and understanding of what's happening. Wait to see if they're satisfied with the conversation or still curious.
- The younger the child, the less information they can process, so follow their lead. Avoid giving more detail than they seem to be soliciting.
- Until ~age six, children have yet to develop a firm sense of permanence so they can't fully comprehend that the pet is gone forever. They may think if they just wish hard enough they can bring their pet back to life.
- Let them know it's okay to ask anything. The answers a child makes up to fill in the blanks might be far worse than reality. With their active imaginations and because it takes time to grasp the experience, they will have lingering questions long after you might expect.
- Help them find words to express themselves. This is done well through reflective listening and modeling. Share your own personal observations, thoughts and feelings, including letting them see you cry. Tears are a physical expression of love. Keep in mind that uncontrollable sobbing may scare them, so try to do that in private.
- Because spiritual, cultural and philosophical beliefs arise with death, you can use this opportunity to teach your children about yours and encourage them to develop their own. One caution: If you tell your child that "God took them because they're special," they are likely to worry about who is going to die next.
- Children can become consumed by intense anger, fear and guilt. These serious episodes can indicate they believe they're somehow responsible for the pet's demise so bring up this possibility for clarification.
- Some healing happens in silence, so give them space and allow discussions to evolve organically. Withdrawal is natural to early grief, yet children benefit from the comfort and security of knowing you're nearby.
- During a big life change like pet loss, familiar routines and rules give us bearings, so try to maintain those that you can. Similarly, children also need breaks from their grief; playing with friends, engaging in fun activities, and being silly help them heal.
- Because children tend to replay major life events over and over again, support this healthy inclination as they work through this loss. You will often see aspects of the death manifest in their play, which can provide a very helpful way for you to actively engage in their process.
- Share the important news of the pet's death with the children's other trusted caregivers and their teachers so they can be active supports.
- Some children have trouble focusing and functioning in school, and may think they're "going crazy." Assure them this is natural and help them to express their grief. If this persists, seek counseling support.
- There are many excellent books on the subject of grief and loss that help to educate children about the death of dear pets. We have a great list on our website.

- More Pointers - To Guide Supportive Adults

- Young people struggle with differentiating bodily sensations from emotions — they tend to combine their internal states. Grief often manifests directly as both specific and vague behavioral and physical symptoms. These include insomnia, lethargy, irritability, aggression, clinging, avoidance, loss of appetite or overeating, rashes, hair loss, nausea, dizziness or headaches. It can be expressed with regressed habits such as thumb-sucking, tantrums, biting, incontinence, or rocking. Reflective listening and helping children articulate their feelings can reduce these issues. If they don't resolve quickly, talk with your pediatrician.
- People of all ages benefit from transitional objects, and because a child's distress can manifest especially at night, inviting them to take one of the pet's toys, blankets, or even the collar to bed with them can help them relax.
- Kids benefit from a tangible way to reminisce and say goodbye to the pet, so we recommend RememberRings. In addition to directly serving the child's needs, they provide a way to start a conversation and share memories and favorite stories. RememberRings are comprised of two parts — one for holding on and one for letting go — so they speak to a child's drive for experiential learning and helps to reconcile their grief while celebrating the deep love shared with their pet.
- Keep in mind that if your kids are present for a euthanasia procedure, it is an intense experience so stay flexible. Clearly describe how the pet had been suffering (identify specific signs) and that the vet has the ability to end that suffering in a very humane and gentle way with a couple simple, painless injections. Describing the experience as a final act of kindness can be very reassuring.
- Let the children cuddle their pet before the appointment if they want. If the procedure is done at home or they come to the vet's office with you, they may prefer to be in another room or step outside while it is done. Afterwards, some may benefit from seeing the body to help them better understand death.
- Some kids ask what happens to the body and analogies can be useful. You might explain that the pet's body is like the cocoon of a butterfly or the eggshell from which a bird hatches. If you don't believe in an afterlife, you can compare the body to a leaf dropping from a tree and dissolving into the earth.
- If the pet is to be cremated, you can explain that the body is put into a heated container until it's turned into ashes which can be kept in an urn or scattered in a special place.
- For burial, describing the body being placed in a special box or blanket in a safe location in the ground is usually adequate. Because kids tend toward concrete thinking, they're usually comforted knowing where the remains will be. Children often want to participate in this ritual.
- There are many meaningful ways to memorialize a beloved pet. A structured tribute ceremony can help everyone, with family and close friends sharing stories about the pet.
- Continue to include the memory of the deceased furry family member in everyday conversations so the children know they have permission to openly grieve, reconcile themselves to the loss, and celebrate the loving bond that lasts forever.
- Finally, remember you also deserve to heal through your grief for your furry friend, so please be gentle and take good care of yourself as well.

Feel free to explore additional resources at www.remembering.pet.

